

I am writing to comment on the FCC's proposal to modify its policies on broadcast television's indecency rules. As a father of six children I strongly object to any change that might increase the chance that any family member will be exposed to profanity or nudity of any kind on public broadcast TV. Shifting standards of morality by a few do not justify a shift in the decency standards that have been established for many years and have proven to be of great benefit to society as a whole. The answer lies not in loosening our standards but in maintaining them. Standards should not change from year to year but are established for the purpose of protecting those who could be harmed by unnecessary exposure to elements of society that promote or condone immorality, infidelity, or indecency. Society does not need more exposure to this type of behavior, language or image. If anything it would do it good to see and hear less of it.
